[BEGIN TRANSCRIBED STATEMENT]

I saw the news about the guy killed in the alley behind The Rusty Anchor. I was there that night. I was with a friend — coworker, actually, named Pete Guidroz — we were there from about 10:30 until almost midnight. I wasn't going to say anything at first, but it's been bugging me. I figured I should come in.

Around midnight — maybe 12:05, 12:10 — I noticed a commotion at the end of the bar. There was a Black man, tall, wearing a white t-shirt. Three white guys were getting in his face. One of them was really going at it — pointing, leaning in, you could tell he was furious. The other two were right there with him. It wasn't just one guy — all three were involved.

The bartender — young blonde girl — came over and got between them. That helped for a minute. But the one in the red shirt — Travis, I heard someone call him Travis — he was still saying stuff after she walked away. Angry stuff. I wasn't close enough to hear every word but his body language was threatening. He kept looking at the Black guy like he wanted to go.

The other two — Derek and I think the other one was Ryan, I heard those names too — Derek was the most verbal. He seemed the most personally upset. Ryan was quieter but he wasn't backing anyone down. He was standing right there, part of it.

The situation died down and my friend and I left about fifteen minutes later. I did not see what happened after that. When I heard on the news that a man was killed in the alley behind the same bar, same night — I knew those were the same guys.

Detective Broussard: How confident are you that Travis Bell was aggressive?

Carlos Reyes: Very confident. The other two were mad but Travis was the one who seemed like he might actually do something. He had that look. You work in restaurants long enough, you see fights. He had that look.
