[BEGIN TRANSCRIBED STATEMENT]

Marcus Webb was my best friend. We grew up together in Baton Rouge. He moved to New Orleans about six months ago — April of this year. He got a job offer from a logistics company in Metairie. It was a good opportunity. He was excited about it.

The night he died — that was supposed to be a celebration. He had just gotten official word that his job offer was finalized, his salary confirmed. He texted me that afternoon: 'going out tonight to celebrate, wish you were here.' I was in Baton Rouge. I couldn't make it.

Marcus didn't have enemies. That's not a cliché — I mean it literally. He was the kind of person who got along with everyone. He was funny, he was generous, he worked hard. He had no criminal record, no debts that I know of. He didn't do drugs. He drank socially.

He didn't know anyone in New Orleans well enough to have enemies there. He'd been there six months. He knew me, a few coworkers, his landlord. He wasn't in any kind of trouble.

I've been told about the altercation at the bar — some man whose girlfriend or ex talked to Marcus. That's so Marcus. He'd talk to anyone. He'd never mean anything by it. He wasn't a confrontational person. He would've backed down from a fight — he always did. He would've walked away. He wasn't stupid. He knew when to leave.

Detective Broussard: Did Marcus have any prior conflicts with anyone in New Orleans?

Jerome Harris: None. Absolutely none. He'd been there six months and he barely knew anyone. He didn't deserve this. He was thirty-four years old with a new job and a whole life ahead of him. He moved to New Orleans to start fresh. He was just getting started.

Detective Broussard: Do you know of any insurance policies, financial arrangements, or anyone who might benefit from Marcus's death?

Jerome Harris: His mother is his beneficiary on his life insurance — a small policy he had from work. His mother is Evelyn Webb, she's in Baton Rouge. She's devastated. Marcus had no enemies. This was random violence. Or it was because these men decided one conversation in a bar was worth killing someone over.
